Question A

According to the second paragraph, inbound tourism to Japan contributes to revitalizing its economy. Approximately 3 million foreign tourists visited Japan in March 2024. The Japanese government now expects to reach its goal of welcoming 32 million tourists to the country by 2025.

Question B

The situation in which a local area's capacity and infrastructure are negatively affected by an increasing number of visitors is known as overtourism. In the recent case of Japan, Kyoto City has decided to restrict tourist access to the Gion district to protect geishas from aggressive photo-taking.

Question C

I agree with the Japanese government’s push for more inbound tourism. This is because Japan needs another way to survive in this world. Japan has not had the same advantages regarding the economy, technology, diligence and creativity, as it did before. On account of this, Japan is now suffering from a weak yen. Japan is not blessed with a large amount of natural resources or a large land with which to grow its economy. In order for Japan to get more money, foreign visitors are needed in Japan. Therefore, Japan should welcome more inbound tourists. (95)

I disagree with the Japanese government’s push for increased inbound tourism. The main reason is that many Japanese people are not psychologically prepared to accept a sudden influx of foreign visitors. They worry that some tourists may ignore or deliberately violate local rules, disrupting their peaceful way of life. While I understand that tourism contributes to the Japanese economy, the government’s priority should be the well-being of its citizens rather than attracting more visitors. Therefore, until Japanese society is ready to accommodate a larger number of tourists, I cannot fully support the government’s efforts to promote inbound tourism. (98)
