Individual freedom refers to the rights and liberties that allow people to pursue their interests and express themselves freely. On the other hand, a society's fairness often means social justice, which involves the fair treatment of all individuals and the fair distribution of all benefits and burdens. Individual freedom and any society's fairness are connected through the social structures and laws that protect personal liberties while allowing all members of the society to lead fulfilling lives. In Japan, for example, "freedom of expression" is guaranteed by the Constitution, provided that it does not conflict with the public welfare. In other words, individual liberty is not granted if it is at the expense of others. (114 words)
